What, then, are the conditions First, a bit of decent land, if possible, near a stream or other water, within reasonable distance of a house, in case milk and possibly some other stores are necessary. Selecting a Site. --209. --The selection is often made before examination is possible. We may carry occasionally in our pocket a list of probable Camping sites, but that is an exception rather than a rule. The best method, at any rate, is to select your land first, and then get permission. If you are certain it is a place where permission is not needed, well, there is your land, take possession and take the consequences. That gentlemanly demeanour, politeness, and civility of yours, with an offer of payment, ought to satisfy...
