Excerpt from The Miami Conservancy Bulletin, Vol. 1: October, 1918 Today on the soil of France there stand American soldiers, facing the German Rhine. They are there to fight. They are there to pay the obligation which in common with you and me, they owe to the America which bred them and brought them up. It is a debt that you and I and every one of us owe to this great land of ours, whose blessings, like the sun and air, have become so common that we forget the obligation they lay us under. But the men in France do not forget. They remember the obligation. They pay the debt with their blood. They pay it for. You and me.
