Such was the case of a merchant, aged 32, who had had irregular sexual habits, and suffered from gonorrhoea and syphilis six years ago. This was followed by eruptions on the skin, varicocele, and a node on the tibia; but during the last two years there had been no active symptoms of the specific disease. His nervous symptoms, however, had no connection with the latter, as they had commenced to trouble him four years before he had acquired it. His family history was bad, for his mother had suffered from melancholia. He attributed the first symptoms of his nervous ill-health to over-work and excitement in business. He felt so bad after a time that he thought his food must be poisoned, and this delusion lasted for some time. His health, however, presently improved, and he was again able to work. About six weeks before he came to see me, he had a relapse of nervous symptoms. He found himself quite unable to attend to business, could not listen to a conversation, and was often obliged to rush out of the room and walk about. His memory was impaired, and there was intense mental depression. The least annoyance or excitement nearly drove him wild. He complained of a headache of a peculiar clawing character, and was unable to sleep or to digest his food. His tongue was red and furred, and his...
