Though progress in many fields of child study has been great during recent years, the most notable change in procedure has been the increased stress put upon accurate and exhaustive diagnosis, and for our purposes today diagnosis is the second great word to be emphasized. If, at any time, one should take a hundred consecutive cases of children as they come to any institution, it would be found that possibly as many as 50 of them would be mouth breathers. Possibly more than 50 would have carious teeth. Possibly one out of four would be from 5 to 20 underweight. Possibly every alternate child would have round shoulders, and it might be true that 25 of them would have lateral curvature of the spine. Possibly 10 would be afflicted with enuresis, and perhaps 30 would be found to...
